October playing a symphony on a slack wire paling.

Maguire watches the drills flattened out

And the flints that lit a candle for him on a June altar, Flameless.

— “The Great Hunger” by Patrick Kavanagh. (Kavanagh and Quinn, 2006)

In 1851, when the Irish Great Famine had not yet ended, census noted that about 1 million people had died for hunger, and a similar number had gone into overseas exile¹. In 1926, as a result of the Irish independence 5 years earlier, the Central Statistical Office was capable to integrate historical documents since famine and showed the fact that the population was decline of roughly 22%² in the 10 years from 1841 to 1851. Using parish baptism data, some scholars have estimated that in the year 1847 alone – which is also known as black 47 in Ireland history – there existed counties with a nearly 80% reduction in baptisms in Munster province in the south of Ireland, while it was not the worst hit by the famine compared to the province of Connaught in the west (Cousens, 1960).

Apart from these quantitative explorations, the Great Famine is equally pivotal in Irish cultural history and ethnography. From Joseph O'Connor’s fiction “Star of the sea” to W. B. Yeats’s “The Countess Cathleen”, together they expressed that the Great Famine not only pointed to the corpses of the dead, but also to a black hole of identity, naming and meaning (Luchen, 2019).

Indeed, the effects of the Great Famine were far-reaching. It was not until 120 years later, in the 1960s, that Ireland’s population began to grow consistently due to large-scale emigration, late marriage and a high incidence of permanent celibacy no longer hold (Grada, 1979), but it was still nowhere near as large as it had been during the Great Famine ³. This also makes Ireland one of the few countries in the world to suffer population decline over the past 170 years when the world's population has increased more than six fold ⁴.

However, Ireland exported enormous amount of food during the famine. In "Ireland Before and After the Famine", Cormac Ó Gráda wrote "Although the potato crop failed, the country was still producing and exporting more than enough grain crops to feed the population. But that was a 'money crop' and not a 'food crop' and could not be interfered with".

People believe potato blight was responsible for the Irish Great Famine.
